TRACK COVERAGE

The topic of “IS security and cybercrimes” has become critically important for multiple stakeholders at different levels including individuals, societies, organisations, governments, and beyond. These two areas go hand in hand. Cybercrimes escalate within the confines of cyberspace (i.e. computers with Internet connections), usually through the exploitation of IS security loopholes and/or via emerging methods created by crime perpetrators. As technology, connectivity, and the rate of IT savviness of the general population (including those of the criminals) advance rapidly, so does the rate of cybercrimes. This has become a worldwide phenomenon with countries reporting huge levels of financial losses. In addition, the indirect costs (e.g. reputation, psychological and emotional traumas) are becoming increasingly problematic. IS community can contribute to this global problem by undertaking and sharing their research on how to improve the management (i.e. detection, monitoring, prevention) of cybercrimes by addressing IS security as well as any other technological and/or human interventions.
